ELECTRICAL EXECUTIONS.

Next week Kemler, the New York mur-derer, is to be executed by the new electrical process provided by the late Legislature of that State in a statute abolishing the brutal rope and scaffold. A good many sickly sentimentalists have shuddered over the electrical means, and some of them have endeavored, but ineffectively, to have the law declared unconstitutional, because it provides an unusual mode for executing criminals. All new things are unusual at first; but that the electrical method will prove less painful and more certain than the hangman's rope, is not now for a moment to be doubted. Kemler will be shunted off into the unknown without a twinge of pain, and in a space of time so small as to be immeasurable by any of the ordinary means of computation.

Since it is the end of the law to execute with the least possible pain, the new method is therefore superior to the old.

Many of the press of the East have taken a decided stand and propose to rebel against that provision of the law excluding reporters from the scene of the execution, and that prohibits the publication of sensational reports of the affair. That it is a wise provision of the law we are convinced. The sensational accounts of executions are demoralizing; they tend to defeat the purpose of the law by making the criminal something of a hero; they familiarize the public with execution scenes, and thus shear them of the terror they are intended to inspire among the lawless. No reporter who has reported hangings will honestly declare that he believes such reports as are referred to conserve any good purpose. The recital of the details of the preparations; the minutiae of the last hours; the dramatic movements of the party mounting to the scaffold; the scene upon the gallows tree; the contortions of the victim; the examination by the physicians; the counting of the waning pulse beats; the removal of the body; the post mortem examination; the excitement among the outside multitude; the devices of the morbidly curious to catch a glimpse of the hanging the after-rush for bits of the rope; the crowding in to look at the scaffold where the victim perished—all these things, together with the ferociousness of the public pulse in the town where an execution takes place, tend, as every experienced newspaper knows, to harden the sensibilities; to deprive the execution of its warning character; to actually stimulate men to murder; that they may enjoy the brief notoriety which the man on the scaffold gains through the mischievous agency of sensational reporting.

The truth is, that so soon as a man is finally condemned by the law to death he ought to be considered dead to society.

As in France, his very name should be supplemented by a number; sentimental women and whining emotionalists should be forbidden access to him, to weep over the murderer and strew flowers upon the floor of his cell, and by their sickly and misdirected sympathy to exalt the villain to the pinnacle of heroism. When a man hour of execution arrives he should be deprived of life in the presence of the witnesses the law provides, and with the least possible dramatic effect. The privacy of an execution adds to its terror, and thus, as a restraining influence, one of its chief purposes is attained by its private character. Most of the New York papers declare that they will defy the law in the Kemler case and make as sensational reports as they possibly can, though any thing more than the announcement that the nerve of the law has been carried out is forbidden. If the New York newspapers do this, we trust that the officers whose duty it is will prosecute the offenders.

The press should be a leader in obedience to the law, not a promoter of rebellion against it.

The fact that one of the imperial household, the Grand Duke Constantine, has declared himself a sympathizer with those in Russia who demand a constitution and representative government is said to have deeply affected the Czar. Well it might.

The Grand Duke, by the expressions used in a poem addressed to him by the young revolutionists of Russia, has proved that he is rather a gushing writer, but that he is a sincere advocate for liberty of speech and conscience, and that he has the courage to take a position that he well knows will consign him by condemnation, if not to residence in Siberia, at least to a long exile from his native land. He certainly is a brave man, though his poetry convinces him of being eminently sentimental.

To arrive at a thorough appreciation of the importance of the conversion of the Grand Duke to republicanism we must reflect upon the fact that he was born an aristocrat, raised in the belief that the Lord has ordained that Emperors, Princes, Kings and Queens are created to rule over lesser mortals, and that the Divine right to wear a crown is superior to the right of the governed to a voice in the choosing of their governors. He has been raised in the atmosphere of royalty, educated in the school of autocracy, and has not at any time been brought into contact with the life of the lower classes, except as curiosities may have prompted him to observe it. He is, in short, of the blood royal and born to wear the purple. When, therefore, such a man declares for democratic forms and the establishment of republican government, and yields up all his special and aristocratic privileges, it must be because conviction has risen superior to his education, and a profound sense of justice and human right has dominated the prejudices of his surroundings.
